prospected geomagnetically and a topographic map was produced for a large part of the terrain. Several ruin complexes were measured and examined by archaeologists specialized in architecture. The recovered find material was reviewed and subsequently catalogued and classified parallel to the excavation work. The entire stock of finds from older archaeological investigations was also documented in the context of a post doc project. With the aid of statistical analyses and patterns of find distribution it was possible to research questions concerning social structure, functional differentiation and the area inner structure of the city. The results from the hospital were evaluated and the different find groups of the material culture were presented in the context of several academic theses. In the process some of the manifold and very interesting aspects were thematised which the first Spanish town on the Atlantic seaboard abandoned in the 17th century and today a UNESCO World Heritage Site can offer to European historical archaeology.
