Sovereignty Suspended Rebecca Bryant,Mete Hatay,2020-07-03 A journey into de facto state building based on ethnographic and archival research in the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus What is de facto about the de facto state In Sovereignty Suspended this question guides Rebecca Bryant and Mete Hatay through a journey into de facto state building or the process of constructing an entity that looks like a state and acts like a state but that much of the world says does not or should not exist In international law the de facto state is one that exists in reality but remains unrecognized by other states Nevertheless such entities provide health care and social security issue identity cards and passports and interact with international aid donors De facto states hold elections conduct censuses control borders and enact fiscal policies Indeed most maintain representative offices in sovereign states and are able to unofficially communicate with officials Bryant and Hatay develop the concept of the aporetic state to describe such entities which project stateness and so seem real even as nonrecognition renders them unrealizable Sovereignty Suspended is based on more than two decades of ethnographic and archival research in one so called aporetic state the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus TRNC It traces the process by which the island's north began to emerge as a tangible separate if unrecognized space following violent partition in 1974 Like other de facto states the TRNC looks and acts like a state appearing real to observers despite international condemnations denials of its existence and the belief of large numbers of its citizens that it will never be a real state Bryant and Hatay excavate the contradictions and paradoxes of life in an aporetic state arguing that it is only by rethinking the concept of the de facto state as a realm of practice that we will be able to understand the longevity of such states and what it means to live in them The Invisible Man H.
