Research Methods in Psychology (FOURTH EDITION) – Beth Morling
<https://www.norton.com/books/9780393536263>

Textbook Chapter 1 (Psychology is a Way of Thinking)

Introduction

- Psychologists are empiricists → basing one's conclusions on systematic observations
- Book discusses types of studies used by psychologists, as well as strengths and limitations of these different types of studies

Research Producers. Research Consumers

- Psychologists engage in both roles, both roles engage in empiricism and communication
- Producers → does research, documents behavior, administers questionnaires, analyzes data, presents results
 - Why the producer role is important: being a producer deepens our understanding of psychological investigation
- Consumers → reads/learns about research results, apply this research to work, hobbies, relationships, personal growth, etc.
 - Why the consumer role is important: we need to be able to look at information (presented as research, backed by data) critically, must be able to sift through suspect presentation of results / suspect results themselves, also important in how we disseminate for our careers
 - Benefits of being a good consumer: important for testing and being sure in the efficacy of any given treatment/intervention before you implement it

How Scientists Work

- 1) Scientists act as empiricists in their investigations
 - a) Not basing conclusions on intuition, casual observation, personal experience, or what others say
 - b) Empiricism is the use of evidence from the senses or from instruments that assist the senses as the basis for conclusion
- 2) Scientists test theories through research and revise theories based on their data
 - a) The theory-data cycle → scientists collect data to test, change, or update theories
 - i) Ex. of using empirical evidence to provide evidence for a theory → Cupboard theory vs. contact comfort theory (Harry Harlow)
 - b) Theory → a set of statements that describe generally how variables relate to each other
 - i) Should be falsifiable (could lead to a hypothesis that fails when tested)
 - c) Hypothesis → a prediction of results of a study design, the observed outcome of an experiment if the hypothesis is accurate, hypotheses are ideally publicly stated before collecting data
 - d) Data → a set of observations, can support or challenge a theory
