

Why do you use directional and non-directional relays in overcurrent relays?

In an overcurrent relay, we use both directional as well as non-directional relays. Directional relay is connected towards the load side of the line which will trip if overcurrent flows from the load towards the source and non-directional relay is connected at the source side which will trip if a fault occurs irrespective of the direction of the current. Nowadays we use multiple conductors or transmission lines forming a ring structure so as to avoid interruption of power supply to the customers in case of a fault in any line. Therefore, when any of the transmission lines undergo a fault, the non-directional relay at the source side will automatically trip and separates the source from the fault point but the load side is still connected to the fault point.
