undertook a multiyear program of analytical work. The summary results of this program are contained in a separate book published in the World Bank's Directions in Development series entitled Low Carbon Development Opportunities for Nigeria which concludes that Nigeria can achieve its development objectives while stabilizing emissions at 2010 levels and providing domestic benefits on the order of 2 percent of GDP. This volume is a collection of the background technical reports on the four sectors of inquiry: agriculture and land use, oil and gas, power, and transport. It contains details on the data methodology and assumptions used throughout the analysis. For agriculture and land use, the study team developed an agriculture production growth model which permits the evaluation of sector emissions in both a reference and a low carbon scenario. The study finds that low carbon practices have significant potential to make the sector more productive and more climate resilient. For the oil and gas sector, the analysis assesses the potential of accelerated phase-out of gas flaring, reduction of leakages, and increased energy efficiency in the operation of facilities to both reduce the sector's emissions and contribute to the industry's net revenues and growth. The analysis of the power sector shows how the country can expand power generation and broaden access to electricity while reducing associated emissions through renewable energy, energy efficiency, and lower carbon technologies in thermal power generation. Finally, this analysis assesses the expected growth in CO₂ emissions from on-road transport under a normal business development scenario up to the year 2035 and it identifies actions at national and local levels that would reduce this growth, resulting in fuel economies, better air quality, and reduced congestion.

Assessing Low Carbon Development in Nigeria: An Analysis of Four Sectors outlines several actions that the Nigerian government could undertake to facilitate the transition to a low carbon economy.
