

Xerox Case Study

Knowledge-Centered support environment lowers service costs for Xerox

Organizational snapshot:

A leading provider of document management technology and services, Xerox Corporation is a $22 billion company with 15,000 service employees handling 9 million customer cases annually.

Challenge:

Xerox wanted to increase its remote solve capabilities to minimize costly on-site technical support.

Strategy:

Xerox engaged KANA's Global Consulting Services to help identify opportunities to improve its remote problem-solving capacity. A Knowledge Centered Support pilot program was launched providing better access to knowledge and improved knowledge lifecycle management.

Remote solutions: Bringing down the cost of "uptime"

Xerox customers worldwide rely on Xerox's products and services to run their businesses smoothly. Maximizing "uptime" of customers' printers and copiers, and getting solutions to customers quickly is therefore of the highest priority for Xerox's customer support. To keep high-quality support viable and run its support operations efficiently, the company's Internet & Remote Services Strategy team is continually seeking new and better ways to service customers at lower cost.

"KANA's Global Consulting Team has extensive expertise in adapting the Knowledge Centered Support (KCS) methodology to industry- and business-specific needs and, in fact, helped create and develop KCS, now the industry-accepted framework for these practices."

Regina Estes, Director, Internet & Remote Services Strategy, Xerox

Customer problems solved remotely are far less costly than those that involve technicians on-site. But when machine parts are required, dispatches are, of course, necessary. Many problems that do not involve parts, however, also result in a technician or specialist dispatch. Remote solutions have therefore been highly sought after by the company. While Xerox's Internet & Remote Services Strategy team has achieved many successful results, continually moving the remote solve rate up, they recognized that they had reached a plateau.

Believing there were untapped opportunities to boost the remote solve rate, and that better use of corporate knowledge was the key to achieving it, Xerox sought the help of KANA's Global Consulting Services. KANA's Global Consulting Services (GCS) provides strategic consulting, systems integration and managed services, and specializes in knowledge management and multi-channel CRM.

The GCS team identified that certain "calls without parts" could in fact, be handled remotely by Xerox Customer Service Experts (CSEs). Moreover, many problems escalated to those specialists
