Four reasons why the New Agenda for Peace should focus on nationally led violence prevention strategies

Over the past few years, the prevention of violence has gained new momentum at the United Nations (UN).¹ However, the UN still lacks a comprehensive strategy to transform these commitments into action. The UN Charter mostly focuses on the prevention of international conflicts, while lethal violence is nowadays mostly concentrated within countries.² Both member states and the UN have increasingly acknowledged the need to use a different approach to prevention, including through the adoption of the Sustainable Development Goal 16 (SDG 16) and the UN-World Bank report, Pathways for Peace.³ However, the operationalization of this approach remains unclear. The New Agenda for Peace is an opportunity for the UN to clarify its approach to the prevention of violence within a country (violent crime, violent extremism, and non-international armed conflict).

This is made even more urgent as the secondary impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic and the invasion of Ukraine—e.g., rising inequalities, shocks on food prices, and negative impact on social cohesion—increase pre-existing social fractures and the risk of violence worldwide.⁴ Building peaceful societies is by definition a sovereign act and requires an integrated approach that addresses the many root causes of violence. This policy brief highlights four reasons why the New Agenda for Peace is an opportunity to advance the prevention agenda by focusing on nationally led prevention strategies.

¹ Adoption of the preventive resolutions on maintaining peace (General Assembly resolutions 76/200 and Security Council resolutions 2289/2018); SDG 16. The secretary-general has also promoted the prevention agenda through his reports on post-conflict and maintaining peace and One Common Agenda, which gives a impetus to peace prevention. In addition, his reforms of the UN system now provide new opportunities for prevention. Other examples include the Regional Monthly Reviews (RMR), guidance's notes on conflict sensitive, and the expansion of the UNDP-DPPA Joint Program with the work of the Peace and Development Advisors (PDAs).
