Commentary

Since the early frontier days, America has been fascinated by violence and outlaws, a fact reflected in the stories and songs of popular culture. Such fascination did not subside as America created a more established order: twentieth century America has produced a number of novels, songs, and, most noticeably, movies, exploring the personalities and terrible deeds of criminals. Movies, such as Arthur Penn's Bonnie and Clyde (1967), Terrence Malick's Badlands (1973) about the killer Charles Starkweather, and more recently, Spike Lee's Summer of Sam (1999), not only feature the outlaw as a character, but also try to say something serious about the larger American culture in relationship to its outcasts. But whereas in the late nineteenth early twentieth centuries, Americans often viewed outlaws as heroes, as men and women who shared their origins and were acting against institutions they themselves despised, the newer writing and cinema necessarily depict outlaws in a far darker light.

Just prior to this series of movies (now about real criminals opposed to the fictional gangsters of earlier movies), Truman Capote, in 1965, took the logical step of what had been the territory of popular culture and newspapers and turned it into serious art form for which he coined the term non-fiction novel (The non-fiction novel is a genre that fascinates many readers because it combines historical realities with fictional devices to explore, interrogate, and imaginatively re-create actual events). The combination was intended to achieve historical accuracy, but was also free to use fictional devices to shed creative light of actual events. Reading about the murder of an entire family in Holcomb, Kansas, Capote arranged to interview the convicted killers, Perry Smith and Dick Hickock. He became fascinated not only with the murderers' personalities and crime, but even more so with the harsh contrast these outcasts and their actions made against the utter normality of the small, mid-western, middle-class town of Holcomb and the nearly unqualified wholesomeness of the family they killed.

Other non-fiction novels of note include: Tom Wolfe's The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test (1968) about the writer Ken Kesey's acid commune (another type of outlaws); Norman Mailer's Armies of the Night (1968) about Pentagon March Mailer took part in 1967 in protest against the Vietnam War, and Executioner's Song (winner of the 1980 Pulitzer Prize) about Gary Gilmore, who after being convicted of robbing and killing two men insisted on being executed for his crime; and Don DeLillo's Libra (1988) about Lee Harvey Oswald and the Kennedy assassination. These books differ from the historical novel in that the central characters are real (not invented), and the writers strive for documentary accuracy where facts are known. The novelists, however, also use fictional devices—such as nonlinear presentation of time, and access to the inner-lives and emotional states of real-life characters (even when the character himself might be unarticulate)—to shed interpretative light upon the events. For example, Capote shapes Perry as an American misfit whose violent aggression is more motivated by social detachment than by than anger. The intent is not, however, to provide a final interpretation or explanation, as say with a work journalism or so-ciology, but to offer an
