

Intriguing analysis of radar signal

A. Pliunginy and S. Kamaševskis

Department of Electronics, Military University of Technology, Poland

Abstract

BLINDING type of electronic intelligence in the primary layer uses parametric measurements of intercepted radar signals. Nowadays modern radar uses more and more complex waveforms. Such waveforms are developed intentionally to make their intercept almost impossible. The main distinctive feature of modern radar signal are hidden in its time-frequency structure. In this work the problem of radar signal feature extraction was considered in time or frequency domain separately, however radar waveforms were relatively simple. Today, however, the signals should be observed simultaneously in both domains. Time-frequency distribution concept offers a new approach in radar signal classification/detection. The paper presents some results of compressed waveforms and through transforms application to wave-pulse modulation analysis of radar signals. Linear frequency-modulated wave within the pulse was considered.

Keywords: signal spectrum, wave transform, compressive Fourier, through transforms, wave-pulse modulation

1 Introduction

Electronic intelligence (ELINT) and electronic warfare support measures (EWSM) devices for modern electronic warfare (EW) systems detect the presence of potentially hostile radar [1, 2, 3, 4]. The first class of EW systems (ELINT) performs mainly the identification and location tasks of unknown sources with purpose to demarcate their parameters that are subsequently included to the threat library. ELINT/EWSM systems operation and effectiveness is not only determined by their technical performance quality but also by their adverse awareness. EWSM systems itself is particularly very sensitive to this factor due to automatic mode of operation. Modern hardware requirements are very demanding with respect to ELINT/EWSM performance and reliability. This type of equipment has to be highly sophisticated with respect to their hardware and software
