

Transitive phrasal verbs in acquisition and use: A view from construction grammar¹

ABSTRACT

This paper surveys a number of aspects involved in viewing transitive phrasal verbs as verb-particle constructions in the construction-grammar sense of the term. The two word-order templates Verb-Object-Particle and Verb-Particle-Object, as fully schematic and semantically and pragmatically distinct constructions (Gries 2003), are discussed as members of different construction networks, viz. transitive vs. caused-motion constructions, with a focus on the latter. Moreover, the word-order constructions are distinguished from specific phrasal verbs as “formal idioms”. It is argued that the notion of “allostruction” (Cappelle 2006) can be fruitfully applied only at the intermediate level of the latter. The first results of a corpus study using data from CHILDES (parts of Manchester, Fletcher), the ICE-GB and parts of the BNC are reported to support the claim that early instances of transitive phrasal verbs exhibiting the word-order Verb-Object-Particle function as precursors (Diessel 2004) to full-blown, lexically and syntactically more complex realisations of the caused-motion construction. In a more explorative and thus also preliminary way, three hierarchical configurational frequency analyses are employed to trace the constellations of selected features of transitive phrasal verbs across different age groups.

Keywords: verb-particle construction, particle placement, caused-motion construction, particle placement, allostruction, precursor construction, hierarchical configurational frequency analysis

1. INTRODUCTION

Because of their complex morphosyntactic, semantic and discourse-pragmatic properties, transitive phrasal verbs have equally fascinated and challenged linguists of all kinds of theoretical persuasions for nearly a century (van Dongen 1919). Among the issues most intensely debated are (i) the placement of the particle before or after the direct-object NP as well as (ii) the degree of idiomaticity or, vice versa, the motivation of the meaning of the combination by its parts, especially the spatial meaning of the particle:
