Abstract

The provision of teaching and learning materials from local resources to enable teaching and learning process run smoothly in the absence of already made instructional materials is an age long practice. But, with the high involvement of technology in human activities especially among secondary school students and teachers, the use of some locally made teaching and learning materials have become uninspiring, ineffective, and unappealing. As a result, improvisation has to be innovative for it to meet the purpose of instruction. Therefore, this paper examined the rationale for innovative improvisation. The paper explores the skills required for innovative improvisation, highlight the challenges associated with innovative improvisation. The paper also presents technological and artistic implications for teachers. The authors concluded that innovative improvisation can only be possible when teachers acquire technological and artistic skills. Thus, the paper suggests the training of teachers in creative arts such as Fine Art and revamping teachers training in Educational Technology.
