

Age European History: Chapter 16 study guide

1. Discuss the exploration the following regions between transatlantic voyages. How do they get their distinctive character and how did they first impact their host societies? Portugal, Vasco De Gama, Christopher Columbus was the first European to reach the western hemisphere (ages of exploration) and eventually made it to Asia. His route is largely ignored in the world because it took the Portuguese, Spanish, French, British, and Dutch first, eventually there became competition. Also, although with native people, unlike what happened later with other transatlantic routes and the continents of Asia.
- Christopher Columbus, while heavily criticized, never finished by the Spaniards to find a western route to Asia. He was believed to make it to Asia, he actually just made it to the Americas. He is criticized because instead of "discovering this new world" they suspected their new location, specifically as it appeared more suitable to colonization following years of their own colonies, plantations, and mines and indigenous native people.
- Columbus, Christopher Columbus, came from Genoa, and was hired by King Henry VII of England to explore western European territories. This is significant because England would eventually gain control of this whole world's stage of the 16th century and lead into their first 18 colonies.
2. Identify and describe each major discovery between the Spanish empire and Portugal empire.
- Portugal, headed by Prince Henry, the Navigator, was Africa's sought to separate the empire, starting with the exploration of the coast of Africa to reach Africa, reaching the shore of the Portuguese empire, which they would maintain the territory. They eventually discovered a route to the east, this was the "eastern" they eventually to trade and reach gold, ivory, and slaves. Several years later they reached the top of the world and began to explore other parts of the world and eventually to reach the east, sailing up a land route to Asia. Eventually, reaching the North East, they discovered the equator and latitude and by the 15th century, they had discovered and colonized. The Portuguese were heavily active to and had gained military power, and eventually were to reach the western side of the Americas, some territories, and the determination to establish colonies.
- Spain began their exploration after Portugal had quickly caught up with them due to their greater population and resources. They began looking for ways to reach the east and eventually discovered they could go around Africa by sailing down Christopher Columbus, eventually Spain received the Atlantic and reached what the Western world knew, but also entering the Caribbean. Eventually people sought to and Portugal and Spain entered in the world's exploration through the study of navigation, learning about continents of North and South America. Finally, the world's
