

ARE WE ALL LESS RISKY AND MORE SKILLFUL THAN OUR FELLOW DRIVERS? *

Ola SVENSON

Department of Psychology, University of Stockholm, Sweden

Accepted March 1980

In this study subjects were asked about their competence as drivers in relation to a group of drivers. The results showed that a majority of subjects regarded themselves as more skillful and less risky than the average driver in each group respectively. This result was compared with similar recent findings in other fields. Finally, the consequences for planning and risk taking of seeing oneself as more competent than others were discussed briefly.

Do people engaged in a risky activity where skill plays some role, have an unbiased view of their own skill and risk taking? More specifically, do they have a correct conception of their own skill and risk taking behavior, e.g., in comparison to others?

One of the most common and best known risky activity in modern society is that of driving a car. Therefore, some observations of drivers' notions of their own driving skills and risk taking behavior will be presented in this paper. The observations will then be used as a start for a brief discussion of the importance of an actor's self image on his risk taking behavior and his readiness to find information about risk and safety applicable to himself.

For a long time it has been asserted (cf. Näätänen and Summala 1975) that most drivers tend to believe that they are better drivers than the average driver. This assertion was based on studies made several decades ago and poorly documented in reports now virtually impossible

* This study was sponsored by the Swedish Council for Social Science Research. I want to thank the people at Decision Research, a branch of Perceptronics, in Eugene, Oregon, Kit Sjöberg and Berndt Brehmer for support and discussions about the paper.
