

Chapter Two: Ecosystems: What They Are

2.1 Ecosystems: A Description

Biotic Communities

- I. The grouping of plants, animals, and microbes we see when we study a natural area is referred to as the area's biota or biotic community.
 - A. The plant portion of the biotic community includes all vegetation. The animal portion includes all creatures. Microbes encompass a large array of bacteria, fungi, and protozoans.
- II. The particular kind of biotic community found in a given area is, in large part, determined by abiotic (nonliving, chemical, and physical) factors, such as the amount of water present, the climate, or the type of soil in the area.
 - A. These abiotic factors both support and limit the particular community.

Species

- I. Species are different kinds of plants, animals, and microbes living in the community. A given species includes all those individuals that are like one another and are distinct from other groups.
 - A. Similarity in appearance suggests a close genetic relationship.
 - B. The biological definition of a species is the entirety of a population that can interbreed and produce fertile offspring.

Populations

- I. Each species in a biotic community is represented by a certain population—that is, by a certain number of individuals that make up the interbreeding, reproducing group.
 - A. The distinction between a population and species is that population refers only to those individuals of a certain species that live within a given area, whereas species is all inclusive.

Associations

- I. The most basic kind of plant community is the association, defined as a plant community with a definite composition, uniform habitat characteristics, and uniform plant growth.
- II. The species within a community depend on one another. For example, certain animals will not be present unless certain plants that provide the necessary food and shelter are present.
 - A. Thus, the plant community supports or limits the animal community.
 - B. Every plant and animals species is adapted to cope with abiotic factors in the region.

Ecosystems

- I. An ecosystem joins together the biotic community and the abiotic conditions that it lives in.
 - A. An ecosystem is a dynamic complex of plant, animal, and microorganism communities and the nonliving environment interacting as a functional unit within an explicit place.
