Abstract: Globalization exists in world from the ancient time. However, its pattern changes as time passes. Today, globalization is one of the important phenomena in both national and international politics as it affects our daily life significantly due to easy and rapid flow of information across the border of a nation. The establishment of several international organizations after World War II and their increasing importance in international geopolitics facilitates the process of neo liberal globalization which further accelerates after the disintegration of communist USSR followed by the emergence of capitalist USA as sole superpower. This paper analyses the positive and negative impact of the modern form of globalization on Indian economy based on the data collected from various sources. Thereafter, the role of states, international geopolitics and modern day social structure are analyzed in order to recommend some steps in order to eliminate the demerits under current scenario especially based on Indian economy and society.

Keywords: Globalization, role of states, international organization, economy, society, Neo liberal.

1. Introduction

Globalisation is the interaction among people from different parts of the world. Though the term 'Globalisation' started to popularise after World War II the interaction among the people from different parts of the world exists since the time of the development of ancient civilizations in around 3000 B.C. The type of interactions has been transformed as the time passes. Initially it was only commercial during the time of ancient civilization when the agricultural activities were initiated. However, gradually it became cultural as the people from certain races started to capture the foreign land due to shortage of spaces for the growing population. In the 18th century, the commercial interaction among people took a new dimension due to renaissance in Europe followed by revolutionary scientific invention leading to the industrial revolution. This incident led to the development of capitalistic ideas which facilitated the path of western colonialism i.e. the development of colonies in Asia, Africa and South America by leading capitalistic western powers facilitated by the discovery of new sea routes in order to fulfil their economic interests resulted in the deep interactions among the people belongs to each continent of world. The relationship between the European states had been affected due to World War I in the second decade of 20th Century. However, after World War II followed by the decolonisation by western powers facilitated the development of neo liberal globalisation led by USA and pro USA western countries which was accelerated after the end of cold war in 1991 due to participation of more states in free trade. Now-a-days, globalisation is mainly commercial in nature which also facilitates cultural and social globalisation rapidly. India, becoming an important member of developing nations transformed economically, culturally and socially in a rapid manner as time passes.

2. Literature Review

The initiation of globalisation is a debatable concept. Some scholars indicate the ancient civilisation as the origin of globalisation whereas some scholars designate industrial revolution as the origin. According to many scholars, globalisation actually started after World War II which reached at its zenith after cold war. However, it is evident that the concept of modern globalisation which is predominately economic in nature had been developed after World War II in the backdrop of decolonisation, the history of interaction among people in ancient and medieval era cannot be ignored.

Impact Of Globalization On Indian Economy:

Globalization I. L. N. Chandra Sekhar Rao,2016 Globalisation and Indian Economy Bharat Jhunjhunwala,2007

This book presents the changing contours of India's position in the global economy. The first section deals with India's defensive posture in the nineties vis-à-vis the Multinational Companies. The resistance to speedy opening up of the economy has enabled Indian businesses to become globally competitive. The second section deals with the challenges before India in the beginning of the 21st millennium as she is increasingly recognized as a world power. The earlier defensive posture has to be changed into an offensive posture now with India aiming to break the economies of the rich countries. This can be done for example withdrawing forex reserves from US T-Bills. The third section deals with the challenges before India in establishing a just world order. The question is how to break the inherent injustice in the world economy where 20 percent of the people of rich countries are consuming 80 percent of the resources. India should not tie its wagon to the engine of rich countries and try to gain from injustice of the present world order. Instead India must take the lead in confronting the injustice perpetrated by the rich countries, organize the developing countries and establish a world economy based on justice.

Instead of denationalization business in India is now more competitive and is venturing forth into the global market. Increased imports and the entry of foreign multinationals have not swamped it essentially. India is master of its own destiny. Instead of economic destabilization there has been since the paradigm shift in economic policy in 1991 a marked absence of economic crisis in India. And instead of impoverishment India has seen a long and unprecedented period of welfare enhancement since it began its reintegration into the world economy in 1975 there has been a secular decline in poverty since then while inequality has not increased much. The policy conclusion that flows from this experience is that India ought to be in general more open to globalization in the interest of sustaining the acceleration in economic growth and enhancing the welfare of its people. To this end it should push forward with the reform agenda. How can India become a regional hegemon?
