

Conduction, Convection & Radiation

Heat moves from place to place. We call that heat 'transfer.' There are three ways heat can move, or transfer, from one place to another, which includes conduction, convection and radiation.

Conduction is when heat moves from one object to another object through direct touch.

If you touch a hot surface, your hand feels hotter because the heat moves from the surface into your hand. If you put a pot on an electric stove, the hot element touches the pot and transfers heat to the metal where it is touching.

Heat always moves from hotter objects to colder objects, so the heat moves from the hot element on the stove straight into the bottom of the cooler pot.

Convection is the transfer of heat by the motion of or within a fluid. Convection occurs in atmospheres, oceans, and planetary mantles; however, it also occurs in soup.

The basic idea behind convection is that heated matter becomes lighter and "rises"; while cooler matter "sinks".
