

Consumers' attitude and purchasing intention toward green packaged foods; A Malaysian perspective

Mohammad Zakersalehi and Amin Zakersalehi

Faculty of Management, Multimedia University, Cyberjaya, Malaysia

Abstract. The interaction of business and environment has been an issue since early 70s. The study of consumers' attitude and purchasing intention toward green packaged foods helps marketers and providers to understand how to improve their green products, what type of green packaging they need and how to attract consumers to buy their products. Packaging as the final tool to reach the consumers has a salient role to transfer the message of green foods. In so far as green packaging is concerned, it is a very new concept in Malaysia. As of today there has been no empirical research on Malaysians attitudes and purchasing behavior toward green packaging. Subsequently the aim of this research would be toward this issue. For the purpose of the study a survey was conducted through mall-intercept personal survey. A total of 134 questionnaires were collected within the Klang Valley in Malaysia. Result of the study indicated that consumers' positive attitude along with demographics can shape the marketing strategy of green food providers.

Keywords: Consumer attitude, intention, green package, food, Malaysia

1. Introduction

The interaction of business and environment has been an issue since 40 years ago when some of the researchers started to write about Ecological Marketing. Nowadays consumers are becoming more educated about their environmental responsibility and have more willingness to choose a green product over a conventional one. Marketers realized that packaging performs an important role in marketing communications and could be one of the most important factors influencing consumer purchase decision. The combination of green and packaging would be a new choice of consumers in developing markets like Malaysia. Marketers who are targeting a green segment of the market should avoid any marketing gimmicks in order to make loyal customers to purchase their green products. Marketers should also notice to subjective norms of consumers, since Malaysian notice to the opinion of the "important others" in making green purchasing decisions.

The customer and product is the challenge of every business, and meeting customer needs is a motive of good manufacturing practice. In order to meet the consumers' needs and wants and for a product to be acceptable to customers, quality and cost of product, the product's performance and even environmental issues should be considered. Malaysia, like many other developing countries, in the early days of abundant resources and minimal development pressures, little attention was paid to growing environment protection and conversation. In so far as green packaging is concerned, it is a very new concept in Malaysia. As of today there has been no empirical research on Malaysians attitudes and purchasing intention toward green packaging of foods. Subsequently the aim of this research would be toward this issue.

2. Green packaging; a novel marketing trend

Packaging has an essential role in marketing and distribution of products. At the point of sale, packaging of products can be a crucial issue in a consumer's purchase decision. It also can impact the consumer's mindset of product by its exposure. Even after the purchase, the package of the product can continue to impact the consumption experience. Scientific studies indicate that packaging allow to attract consumer's attention, transfer valuable product information, position the product in the consumer's mind and
