Introduction

For a people reveling in discord, Indians have become increasingly united when it comes to sharing the dread of their water-scarce future. Also visible with this growing concern is a rapidly spreading sense of disenchantment towards the inadequacy and apathy of governments in dealing with recurrent cycles of flood and drought, occurring simultaneously in different parts of the country. But ideas like the Garland canal and the Ganga-Cauvery Link were routinely dismissed as too grandiose for a resource-strapped nation. The Indian psyche was, however, never fully disassociated with the idea: Prime Minister, Mrs. Indira Gandhi constituted the National Water Development Agency (NWDA) to start detailed planning of a mega-project, which no one imagined would ever leave the drawing board.

Implementing the mega-scheme, which required pre-feasibility studies, feasibility studies, environment impact studies and the like, was destined to be a long, drawn out process. But in 2003, acting on an innocuous petition from a lawyer, the Supreme Court of India decided that
