

Revamping India's National Security Structure: Agenda for the Indian Government

The 2014 elections for the Sixteenth Lok Sabha saw the Indian electorate delivering a positive, decisive mandate to a single party after a gap of almost three decades. An important area which is in need for urgent attention from the Narendra Modi-government is India's national security structure. Despite past efforts at reform, India's national security structure continues to be plagued by absence of coordination, turf battles and paucity of human resources. Many of these problems are symptomatic of systemic ills which therefore require a holistic relook.

In order for India to achieve its national interests it should be able to work in a coordinated fashion. This necessitates a holistic revamping of the existing national security apparatus and its workings. Putting in place a mechanism that develops long-term strategies and coordinates their execution is imperative as is and strengthening the National Security Advisor's (NSA's) support structure. In addition, such a revamp should also include reforms to the existing higher defence organisation and intelligence setup. This brief will flag some of the important issues the incoming government needs to focus on in order to strengthen India's national security architecture.
