INTRODUCTION TO CRIMINAL PSYCHOLOGY

Aim

To define crime and criminal psychology.

Before we go on to consider the work of the criminal psychologist, let us first consider what exactly is crime? How may there you know that answer to that, but as with most things, it is not as simple as we might first think.

Definitions of Crime

In psychology, there are three theories that are the most widespread approaches to defining crime. There are other approaches, but as these are the most widely accepted, we will consider those here.

The Consensus View

This view stems from the sociological theories of T. Parsons (1951). This notion of thought holds that society functions as an integrated structure, the stability of which is dependent on consensus or agreement by its members, so that the rules, values and norms are accepted by all. Therefore, the legal system of the society is a reflection of what is considered tolerable and acceptable behaviour within that particular society (i.e. acceptable behaviour is development of by the majority).

Before a crime can be said to have occurred, it has to be committed. So without an action, there can be no crime.

The act must be legally forbidden. It is not enough to just be anti-social behaviour. For example, picking your nose in public is considered anti-social in many cultures, but it is not considered a crime. So the act must be forbidden by law.

Mens rea: the person who commits the act must also have a criminal intent to commit the act. For example, if a person drives a car and hits another car we would have to consider whether there was criminal intent in other words, was it an accident or did the driver intentionally hit the car?

There is also the issue of moral wrong. That is, something may be morally wrong but this does not necessarily mean that it is legally wrong. For example, racism and sexism are morally wrong but it is only in modern times that they have become legally wrong acts.

What is considered a crime within societies vary also change. For example, in the past, getting a head bump, being homosexual, or having an abortion, or those all were considered criminal offences. Laws change all the time so fit in with what society considers acceptable and not acceptable.

Some behaviours such as acts of prostitution, will fit in and not fit in the legal system but some will tend to become more progressively such as murder, assault, rape, inflicting harm on property (burglary, trespass).
