Breaking down the silos of operations and business support systems (OSS/BSS) to form an integrated, cross-functional platform that can take a product from conception to execution in a simplified and consistent manner will cut time to market from months and years to weeks.

BY IAN PRIMA, LARS ANGELEN, EDYARD BRANK AND HENNER ACHERLAL

The systems that keep networks running and profitable are in the direct line of fire when it comes to implementing change. So, as the world moves toward global connectivity, as smartphones cause a shift in user behavior, and as subscribers demand more personalized products and more greater control, the functions of OSS/BSS – such as planning, configuration, fulfillment, charging, billing and analytics – need to be integrated.

A consolidated architecture there is a typical computer-science approach for bringing together the two silos of different systems. By adopting one (a consolidated architecture for OSS/BSS), operators will be able to maintain control over costs while implementing network changes effectively.

The challenges of evolution

By expanding the functionality and information held in their networks, operators have the opportunity to create innovative and even more complex value chains that include developers, OTT players and subscribers. In these new value chains, the flow of information and control shifts from end-to-end to multidirectional, and participants can be consumers of services and information as well as being producers of them.

New business models for network operators are based on providing anything as a service (XaaS) – including SaaS, PaaS, IaaS and NaaS – and when using this model, it is not just value chains that become more complex; the life cycle of products and services also become more diversified.

How then, as business models advance, should OSS/BSS requirements evolve to cater for factors such as big data, personalization and virtualization? The simple answer is through configurability. To create a high level of flexibility, the evolution of OSS/BSS needs to be configuration-driven, with an architecture based on components.

The impact of big data

Information is a critical resource. Good information is a key asset – one that can be traded, and one that is critical to optimizing operations. As information, the rate of creation increases, and a wider variety of data that is both structured and unstructured flows into OSS/BSS, access to storage needs to be efficient. In this way, tasks and optimization processes can maximize the use of existing infrastructure and long-data duplication is a minimum.

Data management needs to be secure and controlled, ensuring that the
