(Introducing Sociology) (Chapter – 5) (Doing Sociology: Research Methods) (Exercises)

(Class – XI)

- Provides opportunity to induce comprehensive and intensive study: a full of life member of the group may move into depth of the matter and should get reliable information. Such information helps the researcher in understanding their internal values.
- Verifiability of knowledge is possible: Whenever the observer is doubtful regarding any information it may be re-examined and verified.
- Weaknesses of participant observation:
 - (a) High level expertise required: Researchers need to be objective. Having been member of the group the individualistic bias is incredibly much possible. The advantage of unfamiliar quality cannot be obtained.
 - (b) Time consuming: plenty of your time is to be spent in establishing rapport with other members and should look ahead to the events, the observer wants to look at particularly.
 - (c) Expensive method: It requires plenty of your time and expertise, the strategy involves high expenditure.

Question 7:

What are the basic elements of the survey method? What is chief advantage of this method?

Answer 7:

A survey could be a quantitative macro research method. It's a shot to supply a compressive perspective on same topic.

- It's accustomed collect information about people's attitudes, beliefs and behaviour.
- It involves the gathering of standardised information from the population being studied.
- Standardised information is gathered by asking same inquiries to all respondents in barely the identical order.

Surveys depend upon questionnaires because the main technique of information collection.

Surveys are of two types:

- Descriptive survey: It provides an accurate measurement of the distribution of certain characteristics during a given population. for instance, income distribution, extent of literacy in a very particular area.
- Analytical survey: it's concerned with different variables. for instance, a researcher might want to appear at the connection between level of prosperity and sex ratio.
 - (a) the knowledge collected through a questionnaire during a survey is statistically analysed to reveal the pattern of regularity. These findings are presented as pie charts.
 - (b) Survey research is sometimes done by large teams consisting of those who plan and style the study (the researchers) and their associates and assistance who may get the questionnaire filled up.
 - (c) If the population of the study is simply too large, the survey is supported information gathered from a stratified sample of the population.
 - (d) the tiny sample that's carefully selected using the above mentioned principles is such the sample represents the complete group of population under study. The results obtained from the study of the sample are generalised to the whole population.

Advantages of survey: It allows to generalise result for an outsized population by actually studying only little portion of the population. Therefore, with the assistance of survey one can study with manageable investment of your time, efforts and money.
