

Fuel Cells Harvest Chemical Energy

6

The fuel cell converts chemical energy from a hydrocarbon fuel (such as hydrogen, butanol, and other fuels) directly to electrical energy through a complex process called electrochemistry. In this process, hydrocarbons react with oxygen and water to produce and the energy released is used to drive a turbine generator. Hydrogen, O₂ and water are the main components of the fuel cell system. Hydrogen, O₂ and water are the main components of the fuel cell system, and the energy released is used to drive a turbine generator. The fuel cell system is a complex process that involves the conversion of chemical energy into electrical energy.

Understanding Fuel Cells

Hydrogen fuel cells have two principal advantages compared to internal combustion engines:

1. High efficiency: Fuel cells convert chemical energy directly into electrical energy with an efficiency of 40-60%, compared to 20-30% for internal combustion engines. This is because fuel cells do not have the mechanical losses associated with pistons and crankshafts. The only losses are due to the electrochemical reactions and the heat losses from the cell. The efficiency of fuel cells is also affected by the operating conditions, such as temperature and pressure. Fuel cells can operate at a wide range of temperatures, from 60°C to 1000°C. 2. Low emissions: Fuel cells produce only water and CO₂ as byproducts, making them a clean energy source. This is because fuel cells do not have the combustion process associated with internal combustion engines. The only emissions are due to the electrochemical reactions and the heat losses from the cell. The emissions of fuel cells are also affected by the operating conditions, such as temperature and pressure. Fuel cells can operate at a wide range of temperatures, from 60°C to 1000°C.
