

DNA is made up of tiny molecules called nucleotides that are hooked together. Their sequence provides the blueprint (code) for building all the proteins in the cells. Proteins do not just make up the physical structures in the body. They form enzymes, which control and carry out nearly all chemical processes and reactions in the body. So, proteins provide the structures and functions the body needs to run smoothly – maintaining homeostasis.

Sections of the DNA strand form genes – the basic physical unit of inheritance passed from parents to offspring. Humans have more than 20,000 genes arranged on their chromosomes.

Because we get two sets of chromosomes – one set from each parent, we actually have two sets of genetic instructions – two variants of each gene. These two variants are called alleles. Matching alleles are found in the same location on each of the paired chromosomes – one from each parent.
