This design allows for settling by letting the upper, longer, run of stairs to slide on the landing. The landing, and the 3 treads below it, rest on the floor and do not allow for settling. This is a common arrangement; settling allowed only for the long run of a stairs with two runs. The short stump under the two log stringers has screwjacks to adjust for settling.

Figure 8.c: Half-log treads can look good, but if they are too green, they will be very convex (inset) when they dry.

is a good guess at the settling, the actual settling you get will be somewhat less than this (and you certainly hope it will not be more than this!). This means that the stair treads will not come out exactly level without a shim of some size at the bottom. At Natural Log Homes we build staircases based on the actual settling we have been getting in many homes, a measurement we have been tracking for years (and it is less than the 6% settling allowance). But the actual settling amount won't be known to owner-builders, because of the variables that affect it: especially the local EMC, the species of tree used, and the starting moisture content of the logs.

So, instead of installing the stairs at an angle, a temporary platform can be built at the bottom of the stairs that is the same height as the total amount of expected settling. This means that the stairs are at their proper angle (treads are level and risers plumb), but it means that there is a landing at the bottom that has a riser that may not be equal to the rise of the rest of the stair treads. Building codes have good reasons to specify that all risers must be the same height—it's safer.

Luckily, the settling allowance is usually close to being the same as one riser's height. Stair risers are usually about 7", and the settling allowance between the 1st and 2nd story is often about 7". As times goes on, in order to keep the stair treads level, the landing would have to be reduced to 6", then 5", then 4" . . . and finally 1", before, you hope, the bottom of the stairs can rest on the finished first floor.

There are other solutions to the problem that are quite mechanical, expensive, and complex. These solutions include circular staircases with risers that can be let down over time so that the risers stay all equal height. Or circular wooden stairs that have a center threaded rod and solid log treads that have the same amount of green, horizontal wood as the walls, and so should settle the same amount. But circular stairs made entirely of green material are less than satisfactory. And circular stairs often have difficult problems with the handrails and balusters.

Perhaps the best solution, in some ways, would be to have a temporary stairs for four or five years and then measure the final floor heights to get the total rise, and make the final, permanent stairs only after all settling is done. Unfortunately, very few customers or builders are this patient. People building for themselves should consider the wait-to-build alternative because it might be their best choice.

Half-log Treads

If you use half-logs as treads, be sure that they are close to EMC. If the log has a higher moisture content, then the tread will warp, sometimes dramatically, as it dries (Figure 8.c).

Self-adjusting Staircase

Here's another idea that works: a self-adjusting staircase. The top of every tread is always level, and the rises between all the treads are always equal—before, during, and after settling, no matter how much settling happens.

The key features of these stairs are split-stringers, pivoting treads, and open risers. Each side of the staircase needs two stringers, not one. This means four stringers for a simple, straight run of stairs. The stringers can be lumber, timber, or log slabs.

The treads (in Figure 9 they're half-logs) are attached to the stringers by pins that
