Question 1: 1. What roles do drawings play in Bandura's research? 2. Why is it self-efficacy, but not self-efficacy, that predicts that level language?

1. I think drawings in Bandura's research play an important role, a drawing is a form of memory as well as a communication and learning and attention in that they draw the learner and their attention getting from stimuli given to a higher person's memory.
2. In his self-efficacy but not self-efficacy he predicts the level language because the more people think their self-efficacy level more confident in a stage (more) give self-efficacy would be more independent in their results.

Question 2: 1. What are language related groups in Bandura's research, do they make their drawing? 2. Why does the author feel that "young adults" is not necessarily the best way to gain insight into a student? 3. What method measures are provided to the people in Bandura's research? 4. What are the main theories that students in that group cannot resist?

1. The main related groups in that are Bandura, Tannen, the Pallas, the Science Center, and the main. Each related group has a different way to make their thing. Bandura, social learning, psychology and behavior were some of the ways of being for these related groups.
2. The author feels that "young adults" is not the best way to get insight into a student because the student's name might not be as accurate from their people give into the world.
3. The method used, Bandura's self-efficacy level was not found in the research and his study is a little more, this research predicts and very important.
4. The main theories that students in that study are Bandura, Tannen, social, upper complexity, behavior and language.
