(1) In metropolitan areas around the world, millions of cars, trucks, and taxis park the streets every day, creating headaches for commuters and polluting the environment. (2) Public transportation saves some of this congestion, but crowding and potential delays are still an issue for many travelers. (3) In recent years, another transportation option has become gaining momentum in metropolitan areas. (4) This option is all about sharing bicycles, which is a creative and innovative idea.

(5) The bike share concept is fairly simple. (6) Bike stations are set up at multiple locations in a city. (7) Frequent users can purchase a membership pass, while less frequent users or tourists can buy a daily permit. (8) Many city bikers prefer bike sharing over ownership. (9) They are not responsible for the bike's storage or its maintenance. (10) Tourists also benefit from having an affordable way to experience the view of a city.

(11) The largest bike sharing program in the United States today is in New York City. (12) Known as Citi Bikes, the program was launched in 2013 and now boasts 16,000 bikes spread across 600 stations in Manhattan, Brooklyn, and Queens. (13) Similarly, in Hongkong, China, a city of 7 million ~~inhabitants~~, there are approximately 15,000 bikes offered across 2,700 stations. (14) In 2016, people used Citi Bikes for a lot of trips, which turned out to be a huge increase in the number of ~~people~~ taking rides from the previous year. (15) These numbers are likely to increase further since the program is set to expand into additional neighborhoods soon. (16) According to Citi Bikes, the bike sharing concept has gained rapid popularity because it is "faster than walking, cheaper than a taxi, and more fun than the subway."

(17) New York City officials estimated that in 2016 the bike share program had kept nearly 5,000 tons of carbon dioxide out of the city's air. (18) Officials in Montreal, Canada, and Lyon, France, have noted similar impacts on air quality.

(19) As populations grow, fuel costs increase, and environmental concerns escalate, people will continue to search for more economical and environmentally friendly ways to travel. (20) Bike sharing is a new mode of transportation.
