System Architecture - revision on a page

The CPU processes data and instructions on the computer. It does it using the von Neumann architecture where the CPU runs programs stored in memory. The CPU has four main parts: Memory, Control Unit, ALU and Registers.

Parts of the CPU

The Control Unit (CU) coordinates the timing and the flow of data to the CPU. Controls program instructions by using the clock circuitry.

The ALU carries out the logic. The clock speed is the number of clock cycles per second that the clock circuitry generates. Measured in Hz or GHz.

The Address bus that pulls data into the computer. Includes input devices (mouse, keyboard) and electronic systems.

There are a series of buses through which data travels across the computer via the motherboard. This is known as the bus.

The data bus carries data from the CU and registers. When the operation has been performed on the data it sends the output to the registers.

The registers store small amounts of data, instructions and memory addresses to be used by the CPU.

The registers store small amounts of data, instructions and memory addresses to be used by the CPU.

The following affects CPU performance

Clock speed - The higher the clock speed on the PC, the greater the amount of instructions the CPU can carry out. One GHz per cycle = 1000 million cycles per second = 1 GHz. Most PCs have a clock speed of between 2 and 4 GHz.

Number of processor cores - Each core processes data and instructions independently. If there are more than 1 core, the CPU will process data faster. Most modern desktop have 4 cores.

Caching - Cache is fast memory on the CPU. The CPU accesses regularly used data within the cache. It is an intermediary between the CPU and main memory (RAM) and the CPU, saving some the distance to the main memory. Cache makes the CPU work faster than it is capable.

Cache size - Level 2 is closer to the CU, ALU and registers. This makes it quicker but only stores a small amount of data (2 - 10MB) and is expensive. Level 3 is quite far and stores data (2GB - 10GB). Usually the CPU will try to use level 2 cache. This is on the motherboard, so it doesn't get too hot.
