strategy for forging samples to fool the verifier into believing that a classical prover is quantum with a constant probability dependent on  $g$ . We also give a natural method for constructing random circuits with a particular value of  $g$  either  $g=0$  or  $g=1$ . We use the classical forging strategy along with the construction methods to show that when  $g$  is small an adversary can extract  $s$  from just  $H$  and forge samples to fool the verifier with high probability. We give heuristic arguments for the validity of these attacks and demonstrate their success numerically. Sample Examination Questions Kansas.
