Abstract : This study investigated the relationship between non-performing loans and bank performance in Nigeria for the period 1994-2014. The study employed ADF Unit Root test, descriptive statistics, and multiple regression techniques to analyze data collected for the study from the CBN, NDIC and annual reports of listed banks. The results of the study show that BAL and DOL had statistically negative significant influence on ROCE, while SUL had statistically negative insignificant impact on ROCE. These results show that high level of non-performing loans would reduce the performance of banks in the long run in Nigeria. The study therefore recommended that credit reporting agencies and supervising authorities should be strengthened in order to reduce the high level of non-performing loans in the banking sector of Nigeria.

Keywords: Non-performance loans, Sub-standard loans, Doubtful loans, Bad loans, Asset quality, Return on capital employed

I. Introduction

In Nigeria, due to the rising increase of non-performing loans, the CBN (2010) through its prudential guideline, required licensed banks to periodically review their credit portfolios continuously, at least once a quarter with a view to recognizing any deterioration in credit quality and that a credit facility should be deemed to be non-performing once any of the following conditions exists; where interest or principal is due and unpaid for 90 days or more and interest payments equal to 90 days, interest or more have been capitalized rescheduled or rolled over into a new loan. Thus they classified non-performing credit facilities into three categories namely, substandard, doubtful or lost (CBN, 2010).

The banking industry, according NDIC (2013) annual statement and account show that the total loans and advances stood at ₦10.043 trillion in 2013, showing an increase of 23.22 percent over ₦8.150 trillion granted in 2012, and that the non-performing loans to total loans ratio improved from 3.51 percent in 2012 to 3.23 percent in 2013, this according to the report was within the regulatory threshold of 5 percent. However, in spite of this improvement, the volume of non-performing loans increased by 13.30 percent from 281.09 billion in 2012 to 324.14 billion in 2013 (NDIC, 2013).

Highlighting, Bloem and Goerter (2001) stressed that the causes of non-performing loans is entirely of our own making of poor risk management. They opined that bank credit officers do not properly assess the sustainability of granting credit to their customers and that they do not adhere to the good lending principles and all the affected banks display similar symptoms such as insider abuse, poor monitoring of loan accounts, lack of qualified staff, little or no cash flow appraisal of loan requests.

This study examined the impact of non-performing loans on bank performance in Nigeria, using return on capital employed (ROCE) as proxy for bank performance (the dependent variable) and sub-standard loans (SUL), doubtful loans (DOL), and bad loans (BAL) as proxy for non-performing loans (the independent variables). The objective was to investigate the impact of non-performing loans on bank performance in Nigeria and thus contribute to existing literature.

The rest of this study is structured as follows: section two provides the review of related empirical literature, section three highlights on the methodology employed while section four presents the findings and discussion. Section five is focused on the conclusion and recommendations.

II. Review of related empirical literature

This study conducted an empirical literature search in order to establish a basis for the study and achieve the study objective. The review of the related empirical literature is therefore presented in this section.

Godlewski, (2004) used return on asset (ROA) as a proxy for bank performance and the result shows that banks profitability negatively impacted on the level of non-performing loans. Also Warue (2013) in a study identified that bank lending rates are positively and significantly related to non-performing loans in commercial banks.
