

Joint Industry Standard IPC J-STD-006: Electronic Solder Alloys

SMT Prospects & Perspectives
by Dr. Jennie S. Hwang, CEO, H-TECHNOLOGIES GROUP

It has been nearly two decades since the global electronics industry adopted lead-free conversion from leaded electronics. Readers who have been in the industry during this period will recognize the changes and challenges the industry has faced and appreciate the fact that taking the element lead (Pb) out of electronics has not been a straightforward path. Right at the outset, in my view, four questions should have been addressed:

1. Which solder alloy could be widely accepted?
2. Which alloy(s) could be regarded as working alloys?
3. Which alloy(s) is (are) merited with high-reliability performance under harsh environments?
4. Could the former three questions necessarily be causing mutual exclusivity?

In this column, I will confine my comments to the milestones, key events/activities, and thought processes, to some extent, of IPC Joint Industry Standard J-STD-006: "Requirements for Electronic-Grade Solder Alloys and Fluxed and Non-Fluxed Solid Solders for Electronic Soldering Applications."

J-STD-006 primarily focuses on solder alloys and is generally deemed mundane—certainly not glamorous. However, solder alloy is critical to electronics, performing a critical function as the interconnecting material for electrical, thermal, and physical connections as well as other surface coating functions. To reiterate my two snippet statements over the years:

"Solder joint cannot perform better than the solder alloy is intrinsically able to deliver," summarizing the inseparability of a solder alloy and a solder joint that is made of a specific solder alloy.
