Abstract

This study examined the relationships between L2 learners' anxiety, self-confidence and oral performance. The participants were 132 Korean college students who enrolled the English conversation classes in 2004. Questionnaires related to anxiety and self-confidence were given to the students and their oral performances were assessed in terms of LATEFL's criteria. Factor analysis indicated that communication anxiety, criticism anxiety, examination anxiety were the main components of anxiety, while situational confidence, communication confidence, language potential confidence and language ability confidence were the components of self-confidence for Korean learners of English. The results of the analyses showed that there were significant effects of anxiety and self-confidence on L2 learners' oral performance: The higher anxious the students were about speaking English, the lower scores they gained on their oral performance; The higher confident they were, the higher oral performance they showed. The correlation analysis of anxiety/confidence and the elements of oral performance showed that confidence was more closely correlated with the L2 learner's attitude and interaction including communication strategies and social conversation skills of oral performance, while anxiety was more negatively correlated with the L2 learner's range of oral performance such as vocabulary and grammar.

More and more attention has been drawn to the individual variations in language learning since 1970s. Individual variations can be attributed to cognitive and affective sides of language learning. Accordingly, both cognitive and affective sides of language learning may be considered in order to achieve successful language learning and teaching. However, actually, until now, research and attention have been concentrated on cognitive aspects of the learner.

Affect in language learning involves various aspects of emotion, feeling, attitude of the learner. Affective sides of language learners may influence the learners' language learning processes, positively or negatively. Thus, a right understanding of affect in foreign language learning can lead to more effective language learning and teaching.

Anxiety is one of the most negatively influential affective variables, which prevents learners from successfully learning a foreign language. It makes language learners nervous and afraid, which may contribute to poor aural/oral performance. One of the personal factors, which are highly correlated with anxiety, is self-confidence. Self-confidence involves judgments and evaluations about one's own value and worth. Self-confidence can be negatively influenced when the language learner thinks of oneself as deficient and limited in the target language. On the other hand,
