

Crosslinguistic Influence of L1 (Arabic) in Acquiring Linguistic Items of L2 (English): An Empirical Study in the Context of Arab Learners of English as Undergraduate Learners

Anwar Moursi

Faculty of Arts, Creative Industries and Education, University of the West of England, Bristol, UK

Abstract—This study investigates one of the most common issues namely the crosslinguistic influence of the L1 in learning L2 grammar, specifically the acquisition of the simple past tense. The researcher believes that the simple past tense forms produced by learners sometimes appear to have originated in L2 and sometimes in L1. An empirical study was conducted on 74 Arab Learners of English (ALEs) which lasted four months. A detailed analysis was made of the acquisition of the simple past tense forms in 222 written texts produced by ALEs. Written texts were collected chronologically from each subject at three stages in the experiment. Quantitative analysis shows the crosslinguistic influence of L1 (Arabic) in acquiring the linguistic items of L2 (English) in general and in acquiring the simple past in particular.

I. INTRODUCTION

In general, Odlin (1989, p. 6), and Larsen-Freeman and Long (1991, p. 5) mentioned that “the study of transfer, or crosslinguistic influence, is peculiar among language acquisition and the phenomenon of language use”. In particular, Jarvis and Pavlenko (2008, p. 4) argued that crosslinguistic influence refers to the influence of one language on another in an individual mind. They illuminated several areas of meaning and crosslinguistic influence which had not been carefully looked at before. They presented interesting findings and an analysis of the relationship between language transfer and SLA. Based on Odlin’s (1989) claim, and Jarvis and Pavlenko’s (2008) findings, the study will investigate the role of L1 in the acquisition of the simple past in the context of ALEs. This will be presented in section two, and more specifically in section four. Briefly, there are four elements used to support the role of transfer in interlanguage, which are: natural languages, universal grammar, L1 transfer, and Markedness.

This paper is divided into six main sections: section one is the introduction, the literature review is presented in section two, section three describes the methods used in the current study, the analysis and the discussion are presented in section four, the conclusion is discussed in section five, and finally, the references are presented in section six. The following section presents the literature review.

II. LITERATURE REVIEW

One of the assumptions of the study is that the concept of interlanguage has had an important effect on the SLA field. I will first outline the definition of interlanguage since interlanguage is studied by many researchers who identify this system differently. Then I will explore how interlanguage might vary between the L1 and the L2, referring to the role of transfer in interlanguage.

A. The Interlanguage Model

Following Selinker’s (1969) ground-breaking paper, most SLA researchers nowadays recognize that second/foreign language learners go through a series of steps when learning a language. This is called interlanguage. A study of interlanguage may shed light on how Arab learners of English improve their internal grammar. First of all we have to consider that it is difficult to examine interlanguage competences directly. Instead, indirectly information about the nature of interlanguage competence can only be derived; this might happen through an examination of interlanguage performance data which come in the form of writing sentences, grammatical forms and spontaneous speech, as Lakshmanan & Selinker (2001, p. 393) pointed out.

The interlanguage hypothesis is defined as the hypothesis that the language learners have a grammatical system that is different from both the first language and the target language but is nevertheless a natural language. That is, interlanguage is believed to be constrained by the same principles as all languages. Ellis (1997) defined interlanguage as a term referring to the variable progression through which a system of abstract linguistic rules is developed. Richard-Amato (2003, p. 37) commented that “this process reflects the systematic development of the syntax, semantics, and
