Abstract

Health effects of non-occupational lifetime exposure to cadmium (Cd) are of growing concern worldwide. This overview provides some context for the current situation in coastal British Columbia, Canada, which arose in 1999 from the discovery of problematic residues of Cd in farmed Pacific oysters (Crassostrea gigas). Efforts are underway to define Cd sources and the geographical and seasonal variation of these Cd residues. The recent application by the European Community of a 1 µg Cd/g (wet weight) import limit to bivalve molluscs and the current deliberation by CODEX to adopt the same value, pose significant threats to the shellfish export trade in the Pacific Northwest (British Columbia, Washington and Alaska), where natural oceanographic conditions and coastal geology contribute to levels of Cd that usually exceed the 1 ppm limit. Human health aspects of chronic Cd exposure comprise an active field of study (this Symposium) and the validity of existing Provisional Tolerable Weekly Intake is being questioned. Bioavailability of Cd from the oyster and scallop matrix is unknown and requires study. Ramifications of this uncertainty may include damage to public perception of the safety of the cultured shellfish product, loss of export market and general undermining of an industry being encouraged by both the Province of British Columbia and Federal aquaculture initiatives. There is therefore a pressing need to redefine what the “safe” limit of lifetime Cd intake is from all sources, and determine bioavailability, specifically from bivalve molluscs. Such information would facilitate the definition of scientifically defensible Cd limits by CODEX.

1. Background and socioeconomics of bivalve shellfish aquaculture in BC

In British Columbia, a downturn in a historically forest- and fisheries-based economy has resulted in hardship in many coastal communities and efforts to find alternative employment opportunities are underway. Diversification into other pursuits especially aquaculture, both finfish and shellfish, has been encouraged by Provincial and Federal governments. In 1997, the BC shellfish industry comprised 258 companies, 423 shellfish tenures and supported ~1000 jobs. The Shellfish Development Initiative announced by the Provincial Government in 1997, planned to double the amount of crown land made available for bivalve shellfish aquaculture with projections of a
