ABSTRACT

It is commonly accepted that collocations are of utmost importance in the field of L2 acquisition. However, EFL/ESL learners' deficiency in knowledge of English collocations along with the trouble they encounter in learning and using them is well documented. Furthermore, it is not clear which pattern of lexical collocation (adjective + noun or verb + noun) exerts more degree of difficulty on learners. Therefore, the current study investigated the Iranian EFL learners' (N=56) receptive and productive knowledge of collocations in one hand and tried to analyze the degree of difficulty each pattern of lexical collocation (adjective + noun or verb + noun) brings to bear on learners, on the other. To measure the learners' knowledge of lexical collocation, the authors constructed, validated and used a 100 test, consisting of 50 multiple-choice and 50 blank-filling collocation items. Pearson correlation along with a series of paired-samples t-test was run to analyze the data. The findings of the study showed that 1) the participants' receptive and productive knowledge of collocations are not significantly related to each other, 2) their productive knowledge of collocations lagged far behind their receptive knowledge of collocations, and 3) the participants' performance were similar on the two patterns of lexical collocation tested. The findings of the study suggest the need for a broader view of knowledge of collocations and adopting a pedagogical approach to the teaching and learning of this important aspect of L2.

Keywords: Lexical collocations; Receptive knowledge; Productive knowledge; Pattern.

1. Introduction

It is widely acknowledged that collocations are an indispensable constituent of second language knowledge and they are important to non-native speakers of a language in order to accurately and fluently master the language (Jaén, 2007; Skrzypek, 2009; Syranova-Chanturia, 2015; Sonbul & Schmitt, 2013). Collocation has been defined within a variety of theoretical frameworks; consequently, it is demanding to propose a clear-cut definition of collocation. One of the fundamental reasons that gave rise to the dissimilarity in the use of collocation is that it is employed by scholars working in a wide variety of fields, and its definition is usually adapted to the diverse aims and methods of researchers' investigations (Nesselhauf, 2005; Peters, 2015).

Among the various views and concerns in defining the term 'collocation', two main viewpoints can be recognized. In one view,
