

Geographically Weighted Regression: A Method for Exploring Spatial Nonstationarity

Spatial nonstationarity is a condition in which a simple "global" model cannot explain the relationships between some sets of variables. The nature of the model must alter over space to reflect the structure within the data. In this paper, a technique is developed, termed geographically weighted regression, which attempts to capture this variation by calibrating a multiple regression model which allows different relationships to exist at different points in space. This technique is loosely based on kernel regression. The method itself is introduced and related issues such as the choice of a spatial weighting function are discussed. Following this, a series of related statistical tests are considered which can be described generally as tests for spatial nonstationarity. Using Monte Carlo methods, techniques are proposed for investigating the null hypothesis that the data may be described by a global model rather than a non-stationary one and also for testing whether individual regression coefficients are stable over geographic space. These techniques are demonstrated on a data set from the 1991 U.K. census relating car ownership rates to social class and male unemployment. The paper concludes by discussing ways in which the technique can be extended.

1. INTRODUCTION

One of the main objectives in spatial analysis is to identify the nature of relationships that exist between variables. Typically this is undertaken by calculating statistics or estimating parameters with observations taken from different spatial units across a study area. The resulting statistics or parameter estimates are assumed to be constant across space although this might be a very questionable assumption to make in many circumstances. It seems reasonable to assume that there might be intrinsic differences in relationships over space or that there might be some problem with the specification of the model from which the relationships are being measured and which manifests itself in terms of spatially
