

Are zebra mussels really invading?

In the mid-1980s a new species found its way to North America. The zebra mussel (Dreissena polymorpha), a small, clamlike mollusk that grows to about 25 cm as an adult, was introduced into the waters of the Great Lakes, probably carried in the bilge of a Russian freighter. The zebra mussel can reproduce in less than a year, and a single female can release 1 million eggs each year.

In the absence of their natural pathogens, parasites, and predators, the zebra mussel populations in the Great Lakes has grown enormously and are now invading eight major river systems, including the St. Lawrence, Hudson, Mississippi, Ohio, Illinois, Tennessee, Susquehanna, and Arkansas rivers. The mussels are spread from one body of water to another by natural flow, carried on the feathers or feet of migrating waterfowl, or by human transport in bait buckets or on trailered boats. Most of the freshwater systems in North America are now threatened by invasion of the zebra mussel.

The zebra mussels grow in massive colonies, where nearly a half million individuals may grow on each square meter of substrate. These colonies encrust the hulls and rudders of ships, the hinges of lock gates, and block the drains and intake ducts used by industries and power stations. In 1990, for example, Detroit Edison spent over $500,000 to remove zebra mussels from the intake pipes of its power plants.

The zebra mussels also have severe negative effects on the local ecosystem. As filter-feeders, they take in water and filter out algae as food, excreting their waste as sediment. A single individual can filter 1 liter of water each day, and a colony covering 1 square meter of substrate can filter 180 million liters of water per year. Enormous colonies of zebra mussels can reduce the algal populations of lakes and rivers, thus removing a significant portion of the base of the food chain and resulting in a decline in the fish populations. Thus, these mussels are a threat to the local biodiversity.

The tremendous filtering capacity of these organisms may have some positive consequences. Zebra mussels have been a major factor in cleaning Lake Erie after a century of pollution from fertilizers and sewage. After the first 10 years of zebra mussel existence in Lake Erie, light penetration in the water has increased from only a few centimeters to nearly 10 meters. If these organisms could be controlled, they may become a useful tool in the treatment of sewage and pollution.

Water quality surface water connectivity and human disturbance data were from the LAke multi scaled GeOSpatial and temporal LAGOS database public lake access sites were from the United States Geological Survey USGS and zebra mussel presence data were from the USGS Nonindigenous Aquatic Species database We characterized surface water connectivity using six unique lake connectivity classes We characterized human connectivity two ways watershed road densities measured in meters per hectare and for a 3 state subset of the study extent the presence of public access sites on lakes We characterized surface water connectivity using a lake connectivity classification based on lake and stream inflow s outflow s Using logistic multiple regressions and controlling for region and lake chlorophyll a concentrations we found that a higher proportion of reservoirs have zebra mussels compared to natural lakes for the 17 state extent At this same spatial extent we found that more highly connected lakes both by humans and surface waters were more likely to have zebra mussels present regardless of lake type Finally at the 3 state extent lakes with a public access site were more likely to have zebra mussels than those without regardless of lake type We conclude that not all lakes are equally likely to have zebra mussels present and that both surface water and human connectivity are important predictors of zebra mussel presence This study improves the understanding of how natural lakes and reservoirs differ and the extent to which reservoirs disproportionately harbor the invasive zebra mussel which can improve management and prevention For example these results suggest that legislation and management focused on uninvaded reservoirs that are highly connected may help slow the spread of this invasive species
