

Chapter 10: Performance Evaluation

Section 1: Defining Performance

- 1. Definition: Performance is the extent to which an individual or organization achieves its intended purpose or goal.
 - 2. Measurement: Performance is measured through various indicators, such as productivity, quality, and cost.
 - 3. Measurement (Process): Performance is measured through a process that involves setting standards, collecting data, and comparing results.
 - 4. Measurement (Tools): Performance is measured through various tools, such as surveys, interviews, and observation.
1. Why do we evaluate people's performance as different levels of performance?
Different people perform at different levels due to individual differences in their abilities, motivation, and resources. Evaluating performance allows us to identify these differences and provide feedback to help individuals improve.
2. How do we evaluate people's performance as different levels of performance?
We evaluate performance by comparing actual performance against established standards. This comparison is done using various measurement tools and methods, such as surveys, interviews, and observation.
3. What are the consequences of not evaluating performance?
Not evaluating performance can lead to several negative consequences, including:
 - Lack of motivation and engagement
 - Poor quality of work
 - Inefficient use of resources
 - Missed opportunities for improvement
4. What are the consequences of evaluating performance?
Evaluating performance can lead to several positive consequences, including:
 - Increased motivation and engagement
 - Improved quality of work
 - More efficient use of resources
 - Identification of areas for improvement
