As discussed in Chapter 3, to evaluate a project a financial manager must compare its costs and benefits. In most cases, the cash flows in financial investments involve more than one future period. For example, early in 2003, the Boeing Company announced that it was developing the 7E7, now known as the 787 Dreamliner, a highly efficient, long-range airplane able to seat 200 to 250 passengers. Boeing's project involves revenues and expenses that will occur many years or even decades into the future. The first commercial flight of a 787 was not until October 2011, flown by All Nippon Airways (ANA); Air Canada's first 787 is scheduled to fly in 2014. Components of the 787 Dreamliner planes will be produced in Boeing plants in the United States and around the world (including Boeing Winnipeg in Canada). How can financial managers evaluate a project such as the 787 Dreamliner airplane?

As we learned in Chapter 3, Boeing should make the investment in the 787 Dreamliner if the  $NPV$  is positive. Calculating the  $NPV$  requires tools to evaluate cash flows lasting several periods. We develop these tools in this chapter. The first tool is a visual method for representing a stream of cash flows: the timeline. After constructing a timeline, we establish three important rules for moving cash flows to different points in time. Using these rules, we show how to compute the present and future values of the costs and benefits of a general stream of cash flows, and how to compute the  $NPV$ . Although these techniques can be used to value any type of asset, certain types of assets have cash flows that follow a regular pattern. We develop shortcuts for annuities, perpetuities, and other special cases of assets with cash flows that follow regular patterns.
