

HOW TO PAINT CITADEL MINIATURES

Nothing brings a tabletop to life quite like a well painted army of Citadel Miniatures. How often have you wondered 'How did the painter get that shading effect?' or 'How was that texture done?' To achieve these effects, there are a range of simple tricks and techniques which can be exploited by every miniature painter.

In this step-by-step painting guide, renowned fantasy artist John Blanche gives you the benefit of his many years of experience. He explains in detail how to prepare and paint a miniature. If you've never painted a miniature before, this guide will tell you exactly what to do. Even for the more experienced painter, this guide should help you develop and improve your skills.

BASIC EQUIPMENT

Everyone needs a minimum tool kit: a sharp modelling knife and at least one good needle file. Several companies produce good knives and different blades to fit them. My preference is for a straight-edged fairly short blade. A long blade is more likely to snap, and so should be avoided.

Needle files are about 4 - 5" long and are available in a variety of cross-section shapes. The most useful are the half-round, triangular and flat types. You can pick up a knife and files at your local modelling store, where you'll also be able to find most of the other modelling tools mentioned in this article.

A Champion of Bloodseek painted in pastel colours. Notice how the highlights of his sword and his armour have been created by applying ink washes over the basic silver colour.

A selection of tools including sculpted knife, needle files, pin vice with drill bit, pliers and small saw.

You'll need fast-setting two-part epoxy glue to attach shields, bases and to assemble multi-part castings. A cocktail stick or old brush handle is required to mix the glue, and you'll need something to mix it on. A nose pad or something similar is fine. Only mix a little glue at a time and use it immediately.

Though they're not absolutely essential for beginners, I also use the following modelling tools: a mounting needle (a long pin will do), a pin vice and 1mm bit, a selection of lengths of wire, and a pair of pliers. In addition, it's useful to have a tube of superglue to hand, a pack of two part epoxy putty, and, if there's any major conversion work to be done, a small hacksaw or jeweller's saw.

A mounted Khornate Chaos Warrior. The horse has been painted like a tiger to represent its brightly patterned skin. When attempting a colour scheme like this you should have a good reference source, otherwise it can end up looking artificial.

The use of contrasting colours, red and green in this case, gives a nice effect. Here it really brings the Squar to life.

This Chaos Sorcerer's sword is subtly blended and picked out with detail to make the hilt look jewel encrusted.

An example of well blended face and nice detail on this Scout.
