

Classification of Crystalline Compounds

Identifying Polymers, Solids, Minerals, and Liquids

Rank of Crystalline Compounds

When crystalline polymers are subjected to stress, they will undergo a phase transition and become amorphous. This is because the crystalline regions are disrupted by the stress, and the molecules are forced into a disordered state. This process is reversible, and the material will return to its original crystalline state when the stress is removed. The transition from crystalline to amorphous is a first-order phase transition, and it is characterized by a change in the heat capacity of the material. The heat capacity of a crystalline material is higher than that of an amorphous material, and this difference is due to the presence of the crystalline regions. The heat capacity of a crystalline material is a function of the temperature, and it increases as the temperature increases. The heat capacity of an amorphous material is a function of the temperature, and it increases as the temperature increases.
