

Anxiety

Michelle G Craske, Murray B Stein

Anxiety disorders (separation anxiety disorder, selective mutism, specific phobias, social anxiety disorder, panic disorder, agoraphobia, and generalised anxiety disorder) are common and disabling conditions that mostly begin during childhood, adolescence, and early adulthood. They differ from developmentally normative or stress-induced transient anxiety by being marked (ie, out of proportion to the actual threat present) and persistent, and by impairing daily functioning. Most anxiety disorders affect almost twice as many women as men. They often co-occur with major depression, alcohol and other substance-use disorders, and personality disorders. Differential diagnosis from physical conditions—including thyroid, cardiac, and respiratory disorders, and substance intoxication and withdrawal—is imperative. If untreated, anxiety disorders tend to recur chronically. Psychological treatments, particularly cognitive behavioural therapy, and pharmacological treatments, particularly selective serotonin-reuptake inhibitors and serotonin–noradrenaline-reuptake inhibitors, are effective, and their combination could be more effective than is treatment with either individually. More research is needed to increase access to and to develop personalised treatments.

Introduction

The anxiety disorders as a group are the most prevalent mental health condition.¹ As of 2013, one in nine people worldwide has had an anxiety disorder in the past year.² Effective psychological and pharmacological treatments are available, although research efforts are underway to develop more effective treatment approaches and strategies for implementation of evidence-based treatments for wider sections of the population than at present. Because onset of many of the anxiety disorders is in childhood and adolescence and predicts later psychopathology, identification of people at risk and interventions at young ages are important treatment considerations. In this Seminar, we review the clinical presentation, diagnosis, epidemiology, risk factors, and pathophysiology of anxiety disorders. Then, we review evidence-based psychological and pharmacological therapies and conclude with a discussion of controversies and future directions. We do not address post-traumatic stress disorder in view of differences from other major anxiety disorders that could not be adequately addressed within the scope of this Seminar.

Clinical presentation, signs, and symptoms

Individuals with anxiety disorders are excessively fearful, anxious, or avoidant of perceived threats in the environment (eg, social situations or unfamiliar locations) or internal to oneself (eg, unusual bodily sensations). The response is out of proportion to the actual risk or danger posed. Fear occurs as a result of perceived imminent threat whereas anxiety is a state of anticipation about perceived future threats.³ Panic attacks feature prominently as a particular type of fear response. Avoidance behaviours range from refusal to enter situations to subtle reliance on objects or people to cope.

Fear and anxiety are common in everyday life. To be diagnosed as an anxiety disorder, the fear and anxiety are marked (excessive or out of proportion to the actual threat posed), persistent, and associated with impairments in social, occupational, or other important areas of functioning. Most fears throughout childhood and adolescence are developmentally normative (figure)⁴—only around 23% represent anxiety disorders.⁵ Throughout adulthood, transient fear or anxiety can emerge around periods of life stress, but these symptoms are not diagnosed as anxiety disorders unless they persist (eg, for at least 6 months) and interfere with functioning.

The panel summarises the essential symptoms for the major anxiety disorders as specified in the fifth edition of the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders⁶ (DSM-5) and the tenth edition of the International Classification of Diseases (ICD-10).⁷ The gist of each disorder is highly similar between DSM-5 and ICD-10, and in both, the fear or anxiety is marked, persistent, and impairing. Revision to ICD is underway, with ICD-11 expected to be published in 2018. Early indications are that clinical use will be emphasised in ICD-11.⁸

Although categorical diagnostic criteria can be clinically useful, anxiety is a dimensional construct, and the distinction between what is normal and abnormal rests on clinical judgments of severity, frequency of occurrence, persistence over time, and

Search strategy and selection criteria

We searched PubMed, PsycINFO, and the Cochrane Library with the terms “anxiety disorder”, “separation anxiety disorder”, “selective mutism”, “specific phobia”, “social anxiety disorder”, “panic disorder”, “agoraphobia”, “generalized anxiety disorder”, “anxiety disorder associated with another medical condition”, and “substance induced anxiety disorder” for articles published in English between Jan 1, 2005, and Dec 31, 2015. We also reviewed the reference lists of papers identified by this search. Given the many references identified by these methods, this Seminar provides representative rather than complete citations. We cited meta-analyses when available and drew conclusions when findings converged from multiple independent sources. When the literature was divided on a particular topic, representative citations are presented for each argument.
