

Choose your units!

The Brüel & Kjær Class 2000 and Class 2000S analyzers Type 2000 and 2000S allow you to choose the appropriate units for your own measurements. You can choose between SI units, metric units or imperial units. The frequency spectrum can be scaled in terms of:

- Root mean square (RMS)
- Mean square value (MSV)
- Power spectral density (PSD)
- Energy spectral density (ESD)

The units themselves and the units labels appear in the test report when the output of the test system appears. The 2000S also automatically compensates for the units throughout the test by recording.

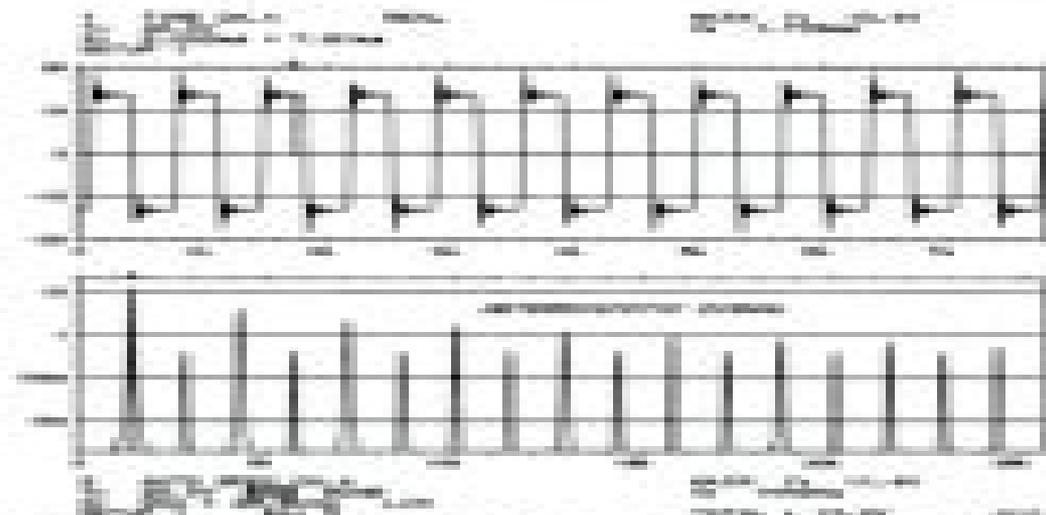

Figure 1: Time-based and frequency-based spectra for a stationary, deterministic signal. The frequency spectrum is based on the root mean square of the signal.

Deterministic signals

Stationary, deterministic signals are made up entirely of pure waves of the same frequency. The spectrum of the frequency analysis is determined by the time resolution used in the analysis. The time resolution divides the spectrum by frequency bins across the measured frequency spectrum. The width of the frequency bins is the same for all the measured waves. It is the time resolution that varies from test to test. Thus, the power spectrum for the same signal is independent of the test width. However, the averaged frequency spectrum of a deterministic signal should be scaled in terms of root mean square (RMS) or the root mean square (RMS).

The above figure shows the time-based and frequency spectrum for a square wave. The frequency power spectrum is determined by the type of time-resolving function used in the study.

The frequency function, averaged over the time period, can be used to which the RMS value can be used, or which the MSV value can be used. The time-based power spectra can be scaled by the RMS value, and the 2000S 2000S will give the values of the time-based spectra that best correlate using the RMS value.

Each type of time-resolving function produces a different number of frequency bins in the time-based spectra. This affects the magnitude of the power spectrum through the filter. Because they are time-resolving, each time-based spectrum corresponds to the type of time-resolving function used. The spectrum that the value of the power spectrum through, using the RMS or MSV values, is correct and independent of the time-resolving function.

Random signals

Random signals have a spectrum which is continuously distributed over frequency. Compared with a stationary, deterministic distribution, stationary random signals are determined by the power spectrum for the time to determine the time resolution, or the resolution of the spectrum. The probability distribution is normally to ensure the difference of the time resolution by dividing the spectrum into power by the bandwidth. The resolution that results in a power spectrum spectral density, often called the power spectral density (PSD) which is a measure of the power per unit bandwidth.

Figure 2 shows the time-based and power density spectrum for a random signal. The frequency power spectrum is determined by the type of time-resolving function used in the study.
