without latency Latency periods are observed in all instances of immunologically mediated asthma even though the immunological mechanism may not yet have been clearly identified The latency period which represents the time between the first exposure and onset of first symptoms can range from weeks to years OA can also exist without a latency period and can occur after a single large exposure to irritant gases fumes or chemicals such as nitrogen oxide ammonia and chlorine This type of exposure results in reactive airways dysfunction syndrome or RADS Occupational asthma has also been reported to occur in few instances from repeated exposures to lower doses of irritant or non sensitizing agents After exposure to an irritant the asthmatic reaction occurs within a short time Since there is no sensitization the battery of diagnostic tests for RADS does not include specific immunological tests and specific inhalation challenge SIC is not used OA without latency is less common it is believed to represent between 5 and 15 percent of all OA cases OA is a common respiratory disease that is difficult to diagnose and treat Several societies have created clinical practice guidelines for OA However many do not address or there is not consensus on the key components identified for this review In summary the guidelines do not agree upon the role of SIC testing for diagnosing OA when removal from work is mentioned it appears to be the recommended treatment The following four questions are addressed 1 What is the best diagnostic approach for a patient with suspected occupational asthma What are the advantages of SIC testing versus peak flow monitoring serial methacholine challenges immunological testing or spirometry in making the diagnosis of occupational asthma 2 In what situations would specific inhalation challenge testing provide additional useful diagnostic information 3 Which treatment is most effective for asthma that is occupationally caused such as removal from work environment versus reduced exposure through modification and treatment with optimal asthma anti inflammatory medications e g inhaled steroids 4 Must patients with asthma that is occupationally caused or aggravated be removed from the workplace environment to control symptoms and or disease progression
