Abstract

The concept of mindfulness has gained increasing attention among scholars over the last decade. While proposed under the name of attention, openness, and non-judgmental awareness, these definitions have been widely adopted and operationalized in the literature on mindfulness. In this paper, we explore the concept of mindfulness in information systems research. We propose a multi-dimensional analysis of the concept through its origins, the main research approaches, ways of measuring mindfulness, and its implications in business and information systems research. We first look at applications of mindfulness within the business and information systems research context. We then explore the concept of mindfulness through its origins, the main research approaches, ways of measuring mindfulness, and the implications of practicing the concept. We conclude by discussing the implications of mindfulness in information systems research and the need for researchers to explore this concept in their research. We also provide a list of keywords that researchers provide concerning mindfulness practices.

Keywords: mindfulness, attention, openness, non-judgmental awareness

Introduction

In the last few years, mindfulness (mindfulness-based stress reduction) (Joshi, 2019; Kabat-Zinn, 2003) has become a popular concept in business and information systems research. It is a form of attention, openness, and non-judgmental awareness (Brown & Ryan, 2003) that has been widely adopted in the literature on mindfulness. In this paper, we explore the concept of mindfulness in information systems research. We propose a multi-dimensional analysis of the concept through its origins, the main research approaches, ways of measuring mindfulness, and its implications in business and information systems research. We first look at applications of mindfulness within the business and information systems research context. We then explore the concept of mindfulness through its origins, the main research approaches, ways of measuring mindfulness, and the implications of practicing the concept. We conclude by discussing the implications of mindfulness in information systems research and the need for researchers to explore this concept in their research. We also provide a list of keywords that researchers provide concerning mindfulness practices.
