

Making a hash of it

Each transaction in the set that makes up a block is fed through a program that creates an encrypted code known as the hash value.

Hash values are further combined in a system known as a Merkle Tree.

The result of all this hashing goes into the block's header, along with a hash of the previous block's header and a timestamp.

The header then becomes part of a cryptographic puzzle solved by manipulating a number called the nonce.

Once a solution is found the new block is added to the blockchain.
