Abstract: Internet banking allows banks to provide information and offer services to their customers conveniently using the internet technology. However, studies have shown that customers have perceptions that impact on the uptake and continuous usage of the platform. The purpose of this study is to understand the effect of customer perceptions on usage of internet banking in commercial banks in Kenya. This study used descriptive research design while a stratified random sampling technique was used to select subjects to represent the target population which was made up of 1,837,312 customers of commercial banks within Nairobi County. An estimated 384 respondents were targeted to participate in the study. 272 questionnaires representing a 71% response rate were received and analysed. Based on the findings of the research it was concluded that customers have perception that have an effect on usage of internet banking. Customer still feel that internet access fees and internet banking transaction charges are high. Costly internet access and unreasonable pricing of internet banking transactions, hinders usage of the internet and by extension technological solutions offered by commercial banks such as internet banking. Commercial banks can relook into the issue of subsidizing the monthly internet banking maintenance fee so as to attract more users and continued usage.

Keywords: Internet banking, commercial bank, Technology Acceptance Model, customer perceptions.

I. INTRODUCTION

The introduction of information technology (IT) has led to the fast growth and development in the service sector making it one of the leading worldwide (Gonra Iev, Dentiste, & Rhonda, 2008). The most noticeable example is in the banking industry, where through the introduction of IT related products in internet banking, electronic payments, security investments and in addition information exchange (Berger, 2008), banks provide more diverse services to customers with less manpower. The fruition of banking technology has largely been driven by changes in distribution channels as evidenced by the introduction of e-channels such as automated teller machine (ATM), tele-banking, PC-banking and most recently internet banking by commercial banks (Gallup Consulting, 2008). E-banking channels have experienced phenomenal growth and have become the main avenues for banks to deliver their products and services (Amato- McCoy, 2009). Nyangosai & Anora (2009) noted that banking through electronic channels has gained much popularity in recent years with majority of the banks having rolled out one or more of these to deliver their products and services to a wide clientele. Significantly, the application of information and communication technology concepts, techniques, policies and implementation strategies to banking services has become a subject of fundamental importance and concerns to all banks and indeed a prerequisite for local and global competitiveness (Ohsuan, 2011). According to Muryoki & Ngigi (2011) continuous technology development, particularly information technology revolution has forced the banks to embrace internet banking channel as one of the strategies for their sustainable growth in an expanded competitive environment.
