Consuming a high density of ultra-processed foods is associated with malnutrition in all its forms as well as a range of noncommunicable diseases and conditions. However, the production of refined foods and rapid urbanization and high energy density diets have led to a high density of refined products. People are now consuming more food high in energy, fats, fructose, and added sugars and micronutrient density. The exact makeup of a diversified balanced and healthy diet will vary depending on individual characteristics, e.g., gender, lifestyle, and degree of physical activity, cultural context, and individual preferences. However, the basic principles of a healthy diet include following the following: Fruit, vegetables, legumes, and beans; nuts and whole grains; eggs; unprocessed meats; millet, wheat, and brown rice. At least 400 g of equivalent portions of fruit and vegetables, including cassava and other tubers. Less than 10% of total energy intake from free sugars, which is less than 50 g of added sugars, but less than 12 teaspoons for a person of healthy body weight, but less than 2000 kcal per day, but less than 5% of total energy intake from additional added sugars. Refined carbohydrates, such as refined grains, refined oils, refined meats, refined coconut oil, refined ghee, and refined products of all kinds, including both industrially produced trans fats and refined products, such as refined snacks and refined products, such as refined biscuits, refined products, and refined products from ruminant animals. Less than 10% of total energy intake from refined products, but less than 1% of total energy intake from refined products. In addition, refined products are not part of a healthy diet and should be avoided. Less than 5 g of added salt per day. Salt should be reduced.
