

NOTES ON HASHING

Author: Jayakanth Srinivasan jksrini@mit.edu

Introduction

Any large information source (data base) can be thought of as a table (with multiple fields), containing information.

For example:

A telephone book has fields name, address and phone number. When you want to find somebody's phone number, you search the book based on the name field.

A user account on AA-Design, has the fields user_id, password and home folder. You log on using your user_id and password and it takes you to your home folder.

To find an entry (field of information) in the table, you only have to use the contents of one of the fields (say name in the case of the telephone book). You don't have to know the contents of all the fields. The field you use to find the contents of the other fields is called the key.

Ideally, the key should uniquely identify the entry, i.e. if the key is the name then no two entries in the telephone book have the same name.

We can treat the Table formulation as an abstract data type. As with all ADT's we can define a set of operations on a table

Operation	Description
Initialize	Initialize internal structure; create an empty table
IsEmpty	True iff the table has no elements
Insert	Given a key and an entry, insert it into the table
Find	Given a key, find the entry associated with the key
Remove	Given a key, find the entry associated with the key and remove it from the table

Table 1. Table ADT Operations
