ABSTRACT— A survey was carried out in the river Afram basin of the Eastern region of Ghana to investigate the farming practices of onion farmers and to identify potential research areas to improve onion production. Fifty six onion farmers selected randomly were interviewed. Ten of these farmers were purposively selected for key informants' interviews, and their nurseries and farms monitored from sowing till harvest. All the respondents (100%) cultivated onion only in the rainy season when fungal diseases and onion thrips were prevalent. Majority (89%) of the respondents planted later than the recommended time; 94.6% cultivated only Malawi which is susceptible to insect pest and diseases and 89.3 % did not practice crop rotation. All the respondents (100%) applied inadequate chemical fertilizer and irrigation water; provided inadequate weeding of farms and used chemical fungicides and insecticides indiscriminately; onion farms were harvested at the immature stage; harvested bulbs were exposed to the unfavourable environmental conditions. Onion bulb yield ranged from only 3.9 -7.4 t ha⁻¹. These findings may suggest that seasonality in planting; late planting; minimum improved technology use; poor nursery and farm management practices, diseases and insect pests; poor harvesting and post harvesting practices contribute to poor onion yields and are limitations to commercial onion farming.

Keywords— onion cultivars, fusarium basal rot, onion thrips, insecticides, fungicides

1. INTRODUCTION

Onion (Allium cepa) is a vegetable and a highly valued spice used widely in Ghana and many parts of the world for flavouring, seasoning foods and for medication (Van der Meer, 1997; Cheema et al., 2003). The food habits of Ghanaians are such that a bulb of onion is used in almost every food preparation. The average yield of onion in Ghana of about 17kg/ha (SRID/ MoFA, 2012) this is low compared to that of other onion producing countries in Africa (FAO, 2000). Ghana's onion consumption needs exceed its onion production and so about five million dollars is spent annually to import dry onion bulbs from neighbouring countries (Ghanaweb, 2012).

Commercial onion farming in the river Afram basin of the Eastern Region which contribute to Ghana onion production (SRID/MoFA, 2012) have several limitations. These include seasonal production, adverse environmental conditions (weather extremities), inadequate access to inputs and insect pest and disease attack.

Tarpage et al. (2011) reported that onions cultivated in the normal season in the Sudano-Sahelian climatic conditions gave the highest yield compared to the early and the late seasons. In Nigeria, Ibrahim (2010) observed that onion yield declined from 40 t ha⁻¹ to less than 20 t ha⁻¹ and from 48 t ha⁻¹ to less than 20 t ha⁻¹ when seedlings were transplanted in March instead of November and December respectively.

Improve varieties contribute up to 30% of crop yield (Shaikh et al., 2002). Combined application of chemical fertilizers and organic manure in onion production increases yield compared with the application of only chemical fertilizers (Abdefrazzag 2002; Blay et al., 2006). Four hand weeding per season has been demonstrated as optimum for
